Dear Madam:— The

National Tribune does not buy poetry; yet anything from the pen of Col. Tourgée has a value for loyal readers, and we are half disposed to depart from our habit. Nevertheless, this writer feels that the poem ought to appear in some high-grade magazine, set in attractive form and well displayed; and such a publication should pay a fair price for it; even should we consider purchase of poetry our price would necessarily be too insignificant to justify your acceptance.

[The writer has not authority to fix ^{values}.]
The paper has a system and a policy and these are for business and should usually be adhered to.

The book I do not think quite adapted to newspaper uses. The poem is inclosed herewith; the book will be mailed under separate cover.

Very respectfully,
The National Tribune.
