

It was in the summer of 1860. The Republican convention, throwing aside the three leading candidates for the nomination had stampeded after three days of balloting to James A. Garfield--all but the faithful "30," who stood until the end, faithful to the hero of Appomattox. The rift in the party was a wide one, especially in the state of New York, and Garfield, as the Lieutenant of Mr. Sherman was perhaps not unreasonably accused of having fostered in the interest of the ~~30~~, whose place he ~~was at length~~ to occupy, the feelings against him on the part of the "Stalwarts," as the followers of Grant were called, was very deep, and their imprecations of the ~~cand~~ ~~gate~~ if not loud, were bitter. This feeling, Gen. Grant did all in his ~~though he was not yet committed to the~~ ^{opposite} cordial and earnest power to allay. It was especially with the ^{wishes of} ~~purpose of~~ ~~overcoming~~ support of his ^{un}successful rival which made the campaign of overcoming this feeling which is not placated, it was thought by ^{the} ~~which followed one of the most notable in our~~ ^{any night}

+ between the hero of the story and Gen. Garfield was the fact that the former was represented as having been returned to Congress while serving with the army in the field. But this was enough. No remonstrance or explanation on my part could remove the impression.

I was at that time, in retreat in the city engaged in revising the copy and reading the proofs of a work the writing of which was a matter of great difficulty because of the delicacy of the relations I desired to trace distinctly yet not offensively, in order to show the causes and character of resulting conditions. As it had been announced for September, I set myself to the task of practically re-writing it and to prevent any interruption, hid away with my wife and faithful co-worker, in a suite of rooms, in an old downtown house, which had a shady street in front and a tea garden in the rear. Our whereabouts being known only to my publishers and the Winter's devil, who came each day with his burden of proof and worse, even than the onus probandi--and took away his tale of "copy" for the next day. Our mail came to the care of the publishers who guarded well our seclusion, being not only the most faithful of friends but fearing also delay for the promised volume. As we took our meals at various restaurants, made few acquaintances and enjoyed in the heart of the great city, a Bohemian whose solitude was most complete.

Despite the exigent demand for copy and proof, these two months and more than half of the hot mid-summer constituted one of the most enjoyable outings we have ever known. We have always doubted whether the owner of the sumptuous belongings in the rooms we occupied, was aware of the use to which they were applied while he sought relaxation in his yacht upon the northern fjords, but that was not our affair, save that we would like to have thanked him for a unique treat

~~the happiness of one of the happiest moments~~
~~of our lives.~~

It was while in this Bohemian retreat that I received a letter from Mr. Nichols, who occupied the position of a private secretary to Gen. Garfield, asking an appointment on a certain day at his hotel to meet him. My acquaintance with the Republican candidate for the presidency had been a peculiar one. When a lad of nine or ten, on a visit to some relatives in Chester Ohio, a student-boarder of the family became my ideal of young manhood. I cannot remember what he did to awaken such admiration, except that he was not above being kind to a boy--a most rare quality in the youth of seventeen. However, "Jim" Garfield as he was called, took the bashful lad with him to the "morning exercises" of the Seminary, the first time by the way, that he had ever entered an institution of learning, above the rank of district-school; told him the names of all the people on the platform and shared with him the book out of which the hymn was sung. ~~had~~ not sing but I watched the Leader who with a slender baton marked the measure, beat his book, tossed his head backward, swayed his body, scowled and smiled, in a way quite wonderful to a country boy who had never seen the like before. After the exercises were over, I made bold to ask just ^{my idol} what his performance had to do with the music --and as a consequence was introduced to the master and my remark repeated, first to my confusion, and the amusement of others. I was even introduced to the dignitary who had control of this wonderful institution at which some two or three hundred young men and women were earnestly preparing for the battle of life. He was a serious-looking man whose name, I believe was Branch. I thought his serious aspect the result of the care and responsibility attending the possession of so much knowledge. I did not like him, however, nearly so as well as the lady teacher, who took my hand chatted with me as if she had known me all my life and installed me in a chair beside her ~~near her~~ during a recitation in some kind, or other--I know not what, but it was evident that "our boarder" knew and was a favorite with class and teacher. I do not remember her name, but do remember that she was a most winsome lady.

I doubt not that I made myself a thorough nuisance to the ~~the expression seems much too young and sunny to~~ young student. Everything of this kind was so new to me that I could have been created with his cleverness. Get permission, not help asking questions. Books, study, the frequent ringing of the school bell, --the idea that grown up people should keep on studying, like the same home been young and fair in the children's eyes expression, children in the little school house at home. I remember how, in the afternoon of visiting ~~or such of its afternoons~~ often about the room, examining over and over again the books he studied and the heavy weight of it in weight, letting and wondering at the size of some of them. I presume these were ~~and the early morning when he may have been and~~ dictionaries. It struck me curiously, too, that all his books were

~~white ones,~~

One day, I presume it was Wednesday, I went with him to some literary exercises in the chapel of the seminary. It was the first time I ever heard him speak and though I have no memory of a word he said, whether it was original or merely a declamation, I remember that I was thoroughly amazed at the performance and wondered that every ~~body~~ else ^{do} was not equally impressed.

Another day, I suppose it ~~must have been~~ Saturday, we went fishing with one of my cousins and myself, ~~was~~ in a mill-pond. We fished from a slab-raft which he built, I was more at home there than in the schoolroom. The pond was full of fish and water-snakes.

Some of the latter crawled up on the raft. He fished steadily and ~~as~~ I recall successfully. My cousin and I soon tired and wished to go home. To appease us he told the names of the fishes and stories of fishing. He promised to set a trap in the cellar for us to catch a rat, and did so after supper--baiting it with a piece of pancake.

When I met him next he was Chief of Staff of the Army of the Cumberland and I was a lieutenant in the line. Having business at headquarters one day, after it was concluded, I recalled myself to his recollection. After that we met now and then and had some correspondence in regard to political conditions at the South.

Though a supporter of Gen. Grant for the nomination, I had, as editor of the Denver Times, predicted the nomination of Gen. Garfield months before, being one of the first to arrive at the conclusion that this ~~was~~ ^{was} the logical result of the factional conflict then pending.

Under these circumstances I was not surprised at the summons to meet the presidential candidate and on sending in my name at the hour designated, I was at once admitted to his private room. Of the conversation that ensued it is unnecessary here to speak. After the matters for which it was chiefly intended ~~to decide~~ had been ^{settled} determined, Gen. Garfield said to Mr Nichols:

document that

"Show the Judge that horoscope which came in the mail this from Baltimore
morning; it will interest him."

So saying, he excused himself to meet other callers, promising to return in a short time and asking me to remain until he came. Mr Nichols, after searching among papers on the tables ~~for some time~~, finally recalled that he had placed this particular communication in his pocket and drew it forth and read it. It was a horoscope of Gen. Garfield cast by some astrologer whose name I have forgotten, but who I remember wrote from Baltimore. It was the result, it seemed, of ~~regarding, took form of and etc and other astrological data~~ information which had been ~~solicited~~ solicited in previous letters.

A and referred to former one dated something more than a year before, the writer in which ~~he~~ had predicted the nomination of Mr. Garfield and some other things not at that time generally apparent. It was accompanied by a chart showing planetary positions, and the like, ~~and went on~~ to predict the election of Garfield, the hearty co-operation of Gen.

the details of Grant to that end, ~~his~~ inauguration and the unexpected rupture of ~~immediate ensuing~~ the Republican party ~~soon afterwards~~. "About four months after your inauguration," continued the soothsayer, "there are indications that

A strange and malign presence threatens to invade the house you will meet with a serious personal calamity. You will be physic- of life.

ally prostrated, it would seem by violence, but it may be the result of some sudden attack of disease. For a long time, your life will be serious in ~~constant~~ peril and I am unable to determine whether you will eventually recover, but think the indications are that you will. The malign force which threatens you is one which had never before appeared in any of the horoscopes I have cast for you. It is dark, ~~of the most threatening character,~~ ~~inconsistent,~~ deadly and ~~treacherous~~, and if such a thing did not seem ~~impossible~~ with the esteem in which you are held by all, I should think it ~~too~~ ~~too~~ portended ~~assault~~ ~~litterato~~ ~~suit of~~ a personal ~~attack~~ by some bitter and unknown enemy. Because of this, I am inclined to regard it as an attack ~~by~~ ^{indicating} some malignant & disease, perhaps a wide-spread epidemic, which would account for the ~~violent~~ ^{Murderous} ~~malignant~~ character of the portending interference.

The planetary conjunction seems,
"It seems however, to indicate an avoidable evil; and I would advise the utmost care in regard to your personal health and safety, at this time and ^{seems likely to do it after some weeks} until the danger passes over as it will in some ^{two or three months} ~~to do after a few~~"

I give the words of this remarkable document as nearly as I can from memory. Gen. Garfield returned while Mr Nichols was ~~still~~ reading. I had the chart in my hand watching the indications alluded to in the text.

"What do you think of it?" he asked, as the reading concluded. I replied that it interested me greatly, but I knew nothing of such matters and at the best could not put any reliance on this, since to be forewarned was to be forearmed. As to the rupture in the party, I made very light of it, thinking the astrologer had drawn his conclusions not from the aspect of the stars but from the shadows cast by the clouds visible in the political world.

Taking the horoscope from Mr Nichols, Gen. Garfield sat down opposite us, looked it over a moment and said:

"Do you know, that man has been sending me things of this sort for years. I have never paid any attention to them, but some of the things he has foretold have come to pass in a very curious way. ~~He was~~ while I was sitting on the Fitz John Porter court-martial in 1862, ~~that~~ I first heard from him. He then predicted certain things so unlikely to happen that I thought the man ~~a simple~~ lunatic and threw his ~~laborer~~ horoscope into the waste-basket without giving it a thought." that happened

"What were these things?" I asked.

"I remember," was the reply, "that he predicted that I would be promoted to high rank after a great reverse to our arms; would resign soon afterwards and would not again enter the service though the war would continue for several years. This seemed impossible, ~~now~~ ~~as~~ but it all happened, as you know. After my election as Senator, which he had also predicted, he wrote me in the very words you used when we met at Chicago just before the Convention; 'Glamis thou art and Cawdor and shall be king.' It was ~~this~~ coincidence which called ~~the~~ ~~law~~ ~~to~~ ~~my~~ ~~mind~~ ~~when~~ ~~I~~ ~~saw~~ ~~you~~ ~~come~~ ~~in~~ ~~to-day~~."

I asked if he intended to preserve ~~it~~ this document and he said:

"No indeed: I do not believe in such things. The issues of life are in the hands of God and I do not care to speculate about what the future kindly hides. You know Caesar's saying about the pleasantest death--'that which is least expected.'

"Then you had better let me have this," I suggested.

"Certainly, if it interests you, you are welcome to it."

Mr Nichols, however, desired to keep it for a day or two, as he wished to show it to some one whom he named, I have forgotten who but it was, he promised to mail it to me in a short time.

I related the incident to my wife that evening, and the next ^{came} ~~next~~ Harry, much more ~~than~~ the day to one or more of my publishers. About ~~that~~ time of the Maine elections, being at Mr Garfield's home in Mentor, O., I referred to ~~the matter~~ and was informed that Mr Nichols had ~~somewhat~~ mislaid the papers, but was again promised that it should be hunted up and sent to me.

I may have mentioned it to others ^{and} no doubt did, as there was no ~~any~~ ~~any~~ secrecy about the matter. It was called very forcibly to my mind by an incident that occurred nearly a year afterwards. In the latter part of June 1881, between the 20th and 25th of that month, I had a conversation with Hon. Joshua R. Gaskill of Lockport N.Y., an old friend whom I met after many years at the Commencement of Rochester University, of which we are alumni. I had just returned from Washington where I had gone on the invitation of the President. On Mr. Gaskill asking how he was, I replied that he looked much worn and out of health, adding that I feared the other predictions of the horoscope might be fulfilled as one had already been, ^{as} adding that I seriously doubted if he would live out his term.

Less than a week after this conversation, President Garfield fell by the hands of Guiteau, who fitted the astrologer's prediction of "strange malign force which had not appeared in previous horoscopes" of his victim. The general verdict of science perhaps, would also sustain his forecast that it was a preventable or avoidable evil. If the Roentgen process had been available at that time, the bullet might have been located and removed, his life saved and the "malign purpose" failed. At least the fulfillment of the predictions as I remember them has been so striking as to make it a matter of regret that the paper was not preserved, or at least a copy taken. It is possible that ^{it} may some time be found among President Garfield papers, but that seems unlikely after so long a time.
