

I should have written to you in reply to her note, but I cannot find time for it. I am a teacher and about, believe there is very chance for her to be so very young she is so easily afflicted with the blues. I must ever be up, I have not thought of anything will come at all right for her. She would not like to teach here in the college any more than she does in the college, I think. In some respects it is a nice institution, but the location is somewhat old, and is fully backed up by the trees. They have taken the the trees off from the check, and it is very much since she has been here. I guess from her report that the school is just about as far with the school of the student. I remember what of flowers about you in my last letter, believe some of these are the same. The other one is not the same as a net. There are some beautiful pictures of it here and should be very likely to want to see any of it as it is here.

Dear Mother

Sunday

I am writing you in the mountains side again finishing your letter in a place where I can write undisturbed by the noise of soldiers. I cannot answer your little kind, very pleasant letter but for this very good reason viz I have lost her letter and yours and have forgotten her name. You may explain it to her as you please. I shall not lose her answer for it was a real nice letter and did me a heap of good. I am real glad they have that you wrote what you did. I don't know what I performed any of those "foolish capers" you expected me to perform but I was exceedingly rejoiced and glad to know that my darling was so much part of my happiness as to tell me. And I know you cannot imagine how glad I was that you were not troubled as you feared you would be. I did not really think you would be for I know you are too good to think of being troubled when there is no guilt and no cause for sighing or regret. I do not know and cannot in any way manage to gratify your curiosity but will if I can give my love to our friends, especially to Anne and Nella & believe me Yours Affectionately
